Shelly's grandma teaches her about ghosts, how to carry them in her hair. If you carry your ghosts in your hair, you can cut them off when you don't need them anymore. Otherwise, ghosts cling to your skin, dig their fingers in under your ribs, and stay with you long, long after you want them gone.

Shelly's mother doesn't like ghosts. She doesn't like Grandma telling Shelly about them. It's an old argument, one they have every time Grandma gives Shelly a lesson. "You'll scare her," she says, like Shelly isn't in the room. "You'll keep her up at night."

"How is she going to take care of herself if she can't take care of the dead?" Grandma asks, and Shelly's mother never has much of an answer for that. So Grandma teaches Shelly about ghosts, how to keep them, and how to get rid of them—not just her own ghosts but other people's, too. Shelly likes to think of herself as her grandma's apprentice.

Today, Grandma's client is a woman clad in expensive yoga pants with her hair in a high ponytail. “We burned sage,” the woman says. She tours Shelly and Grandma around her haunted apartment—it’s bright and airy, much bigger than the old duplex Shelly and her mom and grandma share. “To cleanse it, you know?”

Grandma smiles, all bland and pointed, and Shelly stifles a laugh with her hand at the image of this yoga lady waving her spice rack around, trying to exorcise her apartment. “To cleanse it?”

“From the ... spirits. The demons. You know.” The woman gestures vaguely at Grandma, at her soft brown skin and warm brown eyes, at the little turtle earrings she wears every day. The things that make some people say Native, but Grandma corrects them and says Ililiw or Cree. “It’s cleansing. The smoke. We fanned it around the whole house and nothing. The spirits are still here.”

Shelly can see the ghost that haunts the lady’s apartment dancing around her feet. It’s a little dog with a constantly wagging tail, trotting around on tiny paws with nails that clack against the hardwood floors and echo through the hallways. It noses its way over to Shelly and Grandma like it wants to play.

Grandma keeps smiling, her eyes on the woman and not the ghost dog. “I don’t use sage to cleanse ghosts.”

“Oh. So it’s like ... for other stuff? Bad juju?”

Grandma turns her back on the woman. “This is a tough case,” she says and winks at Shelly. “I might have to charge a little more for the work. Do you mind?”

Grandma heads deeper into the apartment, listening to the woman talk seriously about the sound of claws scraping over the floors and the cold wind that blows around her ankles whenever she comes home—about how she feels like the spirits want her gone, and isn’t it weird that her brand new condo is haunted like this?

Shelly takes a seat in the hallway and clucks her tongue at the dog, smiling. She’s never had a pet before—too expensive—but she likes dogs. A ghost dog would be a good pet—ghosts don’t need feeding the same way living beings do.

“It’s okay,” she tells the dog, leaning toward it so Grandma’s client won’t hear her whispering. She tugs the tie off the end of the braid Grandma wove her long, dark hair into and combs her fingers through it, loosening it. “Grandma and I are going to take you for a walk.”

The dog’s tail wags even harder and Shelly lets it dance around her, nipping at the ends of her hair as she waits for Grandma to finish talking to the woman about the monster she imagines is hiding under her bed.

People are always coming by the house to see if Grandma will get rid of their ghosts—cats that wind around their ankles and trip them when they walk. Dogs that bark in the middle of the night, startling them out of sleep.

Shelly catches the dog in the ends of her hair then scoops it into her arms when Grandma and the woman come back into the hallway, scratching it under the chin. Holding it is like holding a cold wind, and when the puppy licks her face it feels like someone is rubbing an icicle against her cheek.

“Will this take long?” the lady asks, getting her wallet out of her purse. “Is $300 enough?”

Three hundred is a lot for a ghost. Most of Grandma’s clients pay in knickknacks and favors and food. Grandma doesn’t normally charge much because if people know they have a ghost, they might pay anything to get rid of them—do anything.

“Not long at all,” Grandma promises. “We’ll be out of here before you know it.”

They walk the dog to the park, and Shelly and the dog play fetch with an invisible stick until the dog fades away, finally ready to rest.

They go home and Shelly helps Grandma out of her coat. Shelly's mother is in the kitchen and there's a frozen lasagna in the oven.

"You've got to be responsible," Grandma tells Shelly. "You can't charge people through the nose to get rid of a ghost."

Mom looks over from putting her hair up to go to work, her uniform shirt all nicely pressed. Her hair is long, like Grandma and Shelly's, but she almost never wears it down outside the house. She doesn't want anything clinging to it.

"I made dinner for you and Shelly." Mom points a finger at Grandma as the oven timer goes off. "You could charge a little more."

"We've got to undercut the frauds so people come to us instead. We can help people," Grandma says, pulling the lasagna out of the oven. "Sit and eat before you go."

"Someone has to pay the bills," Mom says, but she sits and cuts up the lasagna in its tinfoil pan. "What about helping us?"

The duplex they rent isn't anything like the fancy apartment Shelly and Grandma spent the afternoon in. The floors creak when it's cold and the front door opens right into the kitchen because there's no space wasted. The cabinets are sturdy wood but old, and every room has orange wallpaper Shelly's mother hates but can't change because they're renting. She did cover Shelly's walls with posters of cats and dogs and other pets Shelly likes but can't have to help make the room look nicer, though.

Shelly's bedroom is the smallest one. With her dresser shoved into the doorless closet, there's enough room for her bed and a bookshelf but not much else, especially since she tends to leave her clothes on the floor—clean things folded and stacked neatly, dirty clothes in a heap in the corner—instead of putting them away where they belong. The only thing Shelly puts away is a sweater, blue with an orange cat on the front. Shelly and her mom found it brand new at the thrift store and it always goes in a drawer because it's Shelly's favorite. The room feels softer and more lived in around the edges with clothes everywhere—more comfortable.

Grandma grabs her purse as she sits at the table, pulling out the money she and Shelly made for the ghost dog. “Is this useful?”

Mom looks surprised. “For just one ghost?”

“The lady was rude,” Shelly says, leaning over to scoop noodles from the pan and onto her plate. “She talked about burning sage to cleanse the spirits from her home, but it was just a little dog.”

Mom laughs, setting the cash down on the table. “One of those clients,” she says. “You need to get more rich people who don’t know anything about the dead—this is the kind of money we need around here.”

“It was a one-time thing,” Grandma says, shaking her head. “I don’t want to seem like some kind of fraud.”

“You go around telling people you can clear out ghosts. You already seem like a fraud.” Mom serves Grandma some lasagna then serves herself. “If you don’t want rude women with small dogs making assumptions about you, maybe don’t offer to be the brown woman they bring in to spiritually clean their house.”

Grandma frowns at Mom. “We’re not a stereotype.”

“Mom, you’re a bit of a stereotype.”

“It was a cute dog,” Shelly says loudly. “A ghost dog would make a good pet, don’t you think? You wouldn’t have to buy food or take it to the vet.”

Mom and Grandma both turn to look at her.

“You can’t keep ghosts hanging around like that,” Grandma says. “Everyone has to move on eventually—maybe in their own time, but it’s not fair to hold someone captive.”

“She knows, Mom,” Shelly’s mother said, plainly amused. “While I support a pet that costs no money, you’re around death more than enough as it is, Shell. Nobody in this house needs haunting. The dead are dead, and that’s the way it should be. Leave them alone.”

“They’re dead, but sometimes they need help passing over,” Grandma says. “Then we’ve got a responsibility to help them move on.”

That’s how it is most of the time. Mom worries about money and whether Shelly will get nightmares. Grandma keeps calm and steady—more sure of herself than anyone else Shelly knows.
